The Volunteer

Here lies a clerk who half his life had spent Toiling at ledgers in a city grey,
Thinking that so his days would drift away
With no lance broken in life's tournament:
Yet ever 'twixt the books and his bright eyes
The gleaming eagles of the legions came,
And horsemen, charging under phantom skies,
Went thundering past beneath the oriflamme.

And now those waiting dreams are satisfied;
From twilight to the halls of dawn he went;
His lance is broken; but he lies content
With that high hour, in which he lived and died.
And falling thus he wants no recompense,
Who found his battle in the last resort;
Nor needs he any hearse to bear him hence,
Who goes to join the men of Agincourt.

Introduction

IT was originally considered that one volume, containing the "Letters from the Front" pamphlets issued during the course of the great struggle recently concluded, would suffice as an official and historical record of the part played therein by the members of the staff of The Canadian Bank of Commerce. Mr. C. L. Foster, the Editor of Volume I, however, conceived the idea of making a more detailed record by the publication of a supplementary biographical volume, and the present Volume II is the result of our labours in this connection.

Biographical volumes of necessity contain an array of dry facts and uninteresting figures. Nevertheless we are confident that the information given herein will prove not only of vital interest to the Bank as constituting an historical record of the war service of members of our staff, but also of intrinsic value as part of the military annals of the Dominion.

Unfortunately the exigencies of warfare do not permit of chronicling the countless deeds of heroism performed on the field of battle, and many gallant acts must perforce go unrewarded and even unknown. It is inspiring, however, to read the citations from the "London Gazette," and they contain flashes of fire which cannot fail to thrill the reader and visualize the scenes of gallantry which they record.

In the compilation of the military records, no pains have been spared to make the work as complete as possible, and exhaustive searches have been made of official documents and archives, at Ottawa, in London and elsewhere.

The assistance rendered by the members and former members of the staff, and the next-of-kin of those who died on active service, in furnishing particulars, has been of the utmost value, and we take this opportunity of extending to them our cordial thanks for their courtesy.

Since the publication of Volume I we have received more recent information concerning the ranks and dates of enlistment in the case of a few members of our staff and the necessary changes have been made in this volume.

We record with deep regret that our obituary list is now 265 and not 258 as stated in Volume I.

Chief credit is due to Lieutenant A. D. Golden, M.C., who compiled and edited the biographies and to Lieutenant D. P. Wagner, M.C., who devoted much of his time to the work and prepared the accompanying map. If any errors or omissions have occurred they are not owing to any lack of effort or diligence in obtaining the fullest information possible regarding each officer. The material examined and sifted, and the correspondence involved, would have been sufficient to deter from the undertaking any but those having at heart a deep interest in the work.

Included in this volume are photographs of the Memorial Plaque presented by the King to the next-of-kin of deceased soldiers, and one of the many tablets which have been erected in the various branches of the Bank in memory of the men who went to the war. In addition, there appear photographs of the various Orders won by our men, which include almost every British Order awarded for service during the war. The reproduction of the badges worn by the various regiments in which our men served, will undoubtedly prove of interest as well as a matter of historical record, and in this connection it will interest friends across the line to note the insignia of the various regiments in the United States Army in which the members of the staff served. For the latter we are indebted to the courtesy of Major F. B. Wells of Minneapolis.

We are glad that we have been able to welcome back to our service a large percentage of our staff who undertook military duty. A number have pursued different walks in life since the cessation of hostilities. To all of them we tender our esteem and appreciation, and we assure them it will be ever our privilege to look with grateful pride on their achievements and service in defence of our fair Dominion.

In dedicating this volume to all those of our staff who assumed military duty, and particularly to the memory of those "very gallant gentlemen" who laid down their lives in defence of the right, we hope that the example of their self-sacrifice will prove a source of inspiration to future generations of officers of the Bank.

H. V. F. JONES,

Assistant General Manager.

31st March, 1921.

Prologue

HE men and women whose biographies are recorded in the following pages have contributed something more than an isolated chapter to the history of the Great War. Their story for the most part is, naturally enough, that of the Canadian Corps, but many served with Imperial units, and not a few with the Allied forces, not only in France and Belgium, but also on the high seas and in Italy, Russia, Serbia, Turkey, Egypt, India and Southern Africa. They were to be found as well throughout the complex organization of the modern army which lies behind actual operations in the field—holding administrative posts, doing duty in garrisons, in orderly rooms and in hospital and ambulance units, and serving on the many lines of communication upon which the combatant forces depend not only for their success but also for their very existence.

The first member of the staff to come into action was a reservist in the Coldstream Guards,*who was stationed at a branch in Western Canada and rejoined his regiment in the field during the advance of French's "Contemptibles" from the Marne in September, 1914. 1914

After the definite checking of the enemy offensive and the victorious passage of the Aisne, the British line was relieved, sector after sector, by the French and transferred to the north, taking up its position from La Bassée to Hazebrouck, with the original intention of outflanking the German right wing and joining up with the Belgian Army. While the right of the British Army was engaged on the Estaires-La Bassée line, the left succeeded in recapturing Ypres, Bailleul and Armentières, and took its stand east of the Yser side by side with the French and Belgian forces.

On 21st October began the German offensive known as the First Battle of Ypres, which was soon raging from Dixmude to La Bassée, the most violent fighting taking place at Neuve Chapelle, and to the east and south of Ypres. It was in this connection that the first of our "Letters from the Front" was written, describing the fighting at Messines on 31st October.† The attack was later renewed on 8th November, but was abandoned owing to the complete repulse of the Prussian Guard at Zonnebeke on 11th November. Ypres I

*A. Hornby, Vol. II, p. 213. †Vol. I, p. 1.

With their numbers steadily reinforced from home and from India, the British now stabilized their positions and, during the long winter months that followed, improved their acquaintance with Flanders mud, churned as it was by rain, snow and shell-fire, and settled down to a trench routine of which small attacks and counter-attacks were an integral part.

Neuve Chapelle

Towards the end of December, 1914, Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry arrived in France, followed in February, 1915, by the First Canadian Division. On 13th March, a British offensive, aiming at the capture of the Aubers ridge and the liberation of Lille, was launched at Neuve Chapelle, preceded by the most intense artillery bombardment the enemy had as yet experienced, which caused great havoc and demoralization in his lines, although it did not achieve for the assaulting troops all that was expected. The Canadian infantry brigades, which had arrived in the trenches on 1st March, were used in this engagement as reserves, the divisional artillery taking an active part in the bombardment. As a diversion, the Germans advanced on St. Eloi, but were repulsed by a counter-attack in which the Princess Patricia's were engaged, and in this sector a period of crater-warfare followed. On 20th March occurred the first death in action of a member of the Bank's staff.*

Ypres II

It was expected that, with the coming of spring, the enemy would renew his attempt to drive to Calais and the sea, and counter-preparations were accordingly made by the Commander-in-Chief of the British forces. The defences of Hill 60, a slight elevation three miles south-east of Ypres, used by the Germans as an artillery observation post, were mined and blown up and the position won after four days' heavy fighting. On 22nd April the Canadians received what was virtually their baptism of fire in the memorable gas attack which opened the Second Battle of Ypres. With their left flank in the air as a result of the retirement of the French Colonial troops before the chlorine, the Canadians swung back their left to a wood just west of St. Julien, in order to cover both sides of the Ypres-Poelcappelle road, their right still resting on Zonnebeke. On the following day the centre and right were severely gassed and on the 24th the attack was concentrated at St. Julien. The fighting which followed and lasted until 15th May involved many Imperial and French units, but the brunt of the attack was in the first instance borne by Canadian troops. Seven members of the Bank's staff fell in action or died of wounds received in the Second Battle of Ypres.

*W. N. Galaugher, Vol. II, p. 159.

Meanwhile the ultimate objective of the Allies' spring campaign continued to be the recapture of Lille, and on 9th May, while fighting was still in progress in the Ypres salient, a Franco-British offensive began between Armentières and Arras. The British were allotted the now familiar Neuve Chapelle sector, the French that in front of Lens. On 19th May the Canadian Division came into action at Festubert, where a series of attacks and counter-attacks took place, and several enemy trenches were captured. Although the greatest gallantry was shown by the Allied troops during this offensive, which lasted until the last week in May, the campaign had small tactical results; its chief effects were a sustaining of military morale, the speeding up of munition-making in England and a deepening of the sense that every resource of science must be put at the command of the armies in the field. The end of May and the early part of June saw further heavy fighting in the Ypres salient and a continuation of the struggle on the La Bassée sector, where the Canadians were engaged at Givenchy-lez-la-Bassée on 15th June. From the end of June to September there was a comparative lull on the Western front, except for continued activity in the Ypres salient, where the enemy used Flammenwerfer for the first time on 19th July at Hooge.

Gallipoli

In the summer of 1915 letters arrived from members of the staff serving with Imperial units in Gallipoli,* which throw an interesting side-light upon the soldiering in what proved to be the one disastrous campaign of the whole war. The main story is grim enough. It had been decided in January to attack the Dardanelles and to make a bid for Constantinople, for the isolation of Turkey from her chief ally would undoubtedly have an invaluable moral effect upon the still neutral countries of south-western Europe and would materially aid in shortening the conflict. The campaign opened with a series of naval bombardments, and on 20th March a naval attack was launched which ended in a serious reverse. On 25th April, under perhaps the most trying conditions existing in any of the theatres of war, the gallant and costly landings of British, Australian and French troops were effected at several points on the southern part of the peninsula. In spite of the greatest heroism and endurance, little progress was made throughout the summer and autumn, even after the Suvla Bay landing of 6th August, and the Allies determined to evacuate Gallipoli, an undertaking of almost unparalleled difficulty, but one successfully carried to completion by January, 1916.

The latter part of 1915 was spent by the Canadians on the Bailleul sector, chiefly in front of Ploegsteert. Life in the line was pleasant enough, provided the sky was blue and the shooting good —Germans from the front line, partridge from the supports. The imperative need of constructing dugouts and proper defenses for the coming winter supplied the troops with plenty of good healthy work, and they had the satisfaction of handing over to their successors in the spring several miles of model trenches. The frequency of patrols, raids and small encounters kept them in fighting fettle and went far to sustain their morale during the inevitably trying first winter in France. Games and battalion sports while they were resting in reserve and occasional visits down the line to civilization were the natural complement to life in the trenches. The intensely human side of what was, in great part, a war of machines, is illustrated by references in these "Letters from the Front" to peaceful events and homely or imaginative ideas. "I was just thinking last night," writes one, "what a queer thing life was out here. I was lying on the cricket field about seven o'clock looking towards the town, which is a very old one. It was a lovely night, with a magnificent sunset, and the old round tower standing up against the sky was like a scene from the 'Arabian Nights,' and for the modern side of life, all around us the Germans were shelling our aeroplanes."*

There is also among the letters a diary which, in its laconic and impersonal telling of events, is an excellent record of the life of the first Canadian Division during its early days in France. "We prepared all day for the trenches . . . At 2 p.m. we marched to the trenches. All got in safely, no casualties. At 10 a.m. Sergeant H— was wounded, which was our first casualty. After twenty-four hours in the trenches we were relieved. . . . At 2 p.m. we went into the trenches again for twenty-four hours, not quite so nervous. Two were killed from an English regiment who were with us. . . . We received our first pay, $5. We went into the village and had a good feed. . . . We relieved the Camerons. . . . Private J— B— was killed and H— wounded with the same bullet. . . . We were moved into an old trench. . . . We built our trench and made two dugouts and laid a brick floor. . . . We had to march three miles to a barracks in Bac St. Maur. There we received our first bath in a laundry. . . . We each received a pair of socks from Princess Mary. In the evening we went into the trenches. . . . Three cattle strolled round back of the firing line, and that day we had fresh beef. . . . Our company had sports back of the firing line. . . . We marched closer to Ypres, passing through Poperinghe. . . . We had orders to stand to in case we were needed at Hill 60, where there was a fierce battle raging."†

*Vol. I, p. 41. †Vol. I, p. 34.

What more graphic or comprehensive picture of life in France than this matter-of-fact description could one desire?

The autumn of 1915 was not a quiet season for the entire Western front, for it witnessed a renewal of the Allied offensive in Artois and a powerful blow delivered by the French in Champagne. The British forces, reinforced during the summer by men of the New Army and more efficiently equipped with artillery and ammunition, took over from the French the sector from La Bassée to Grenay, about four miles west of Lens. It was decided once more to attack the ridges that gave the enemy possession of the industrial centres of northern France. While naval demonstrations were being made along the Belgian coast and attacks delivered from the Ypres salient and at Neuve Chapelle, the real offensive was accordingly launched, on 25th September, by the British at Loos and by the French at Vimy. Preceded and supported by terrific bombardments, the advance was made over a terrain difficult by nature and rendered more so by the enemy's system of defence. Loos and Hulluch, and part of Hill 70, were taken by the British, while the French took Souchez. The fighting among the slag-heaps and coal-pits of Lens, converted by the Germans into formidable redoubts, lasted until 15th October, but the limited success of the operations was evident some time before this date. Lack of co-ordination among the units engaged and lack of mobile reserves prevented an even and sustained advance. Meanwhile intense fighting was proceeding in Champagne, to the north of Suippes, where the French on 25th September had broken the German line over a length of fifteen miles and in five days had taken 23,000 prisoners.

Loos

On the junction of the Second Canadian Division, which landed in France on 14th September, with the First Division, the newly formed Canadian Corps took over the line from Ploegsteert to St. Eloi. During the Loos fighting, the Corps staged a sham attack to weaken the enemy's concentration, and in the succeeding months of the year carried out many patrols and trench raids. The Messines sector and the line in front of Kemmel were particularly active in this regard, several brilliant surprise attacks being made, one of which, carried out on the night of 16-17th November, was mentioned in Marshal Joffre's orders as a model of that type of operation. Towards the middle of January details of the Third Division took their place in the line as relieving units, and arrangements were made in March for the Canadians to take over from the Fifth British Corps the line from St. Eloi to Hooge. On the St. Eloi front, this meant holding the craters of a number of mines sprung by the British on 27th March. The craters were taken over by the Second Canadian Division on the night of 3-4th April, but two nights later, during a relief, a terrific bombardment fell on the scarcely consolidated line, followed by a powerful attack by the enemy. Counter-attack after counter-attack was delivered by the Canadians and on 11th April three out of the five craters were again in their hands; two, however, were carried by the Germans a week later. These engagements, local though they were, constituted the bloodiest series of actions fought by the Canadians since the Second Battle of Ypres.

The fighting that took place during May and June in "The Salient," as also on scattered portions of the Western front, was only part of the great battle that had broken out on 22nd February, when the German storm-troops were hurled against the outer forts of Verdun. The defence of that stronghold, through all the fluctuations of four months of battle, is one of the finest achievements in the history of French arms, but the ordeal was correspondingly severe. The main object of the British campaign in 1916 was therefore the relief of the pressure on Verdun. The British line, now stretching from a point on the Yperlée Canal a few miles north of Ypres to Bray on the Somme, was the scene of numerous small engagements. Partly as a holding device, therefore, and partly as an offensive movement, the enemy concentrated a second force opposite Ypres, and on 2nd June made his third attempt to dominate the salient from the eastern ridges. An intense bombardment was directed on the lines of the Third Division (which now included the Princess Patricia's) in front of Mount Sorel and Observatory Ridge, which wiped trenches and garrisons literally out of existence. Later in the day, the fire fell upon the line skirting Sanctuary Wood. The Canadian defences were pierced and the safety of Ypres itself appeared to be threatened. On 6th June, after springing a series of mines north of the Menin road, the enemy extended his artillery bombardment to the left flank of the Canadian Corps, seized Hooge, and established himself in Zouave Wood. On 13th June the Canadians made a vigorous counter-attack between Hooge and Hill 60, which drove the enemy from the ridges and practically restored the old line. Thus ended what is known to many as the Third Battle of Ypres, although that title is more generally applied to the operations of the following year. Ten members of the Bank's staff fell in this series of engagements.

Verdun

Sanctuary Wood

Somme

Midway between the powerful enemy concentration opposite Verdun and the less formidable but nevertheless powerful force in front of Ypres lay the most favourable opening for an Allied counter-offensive. On 25th June, a cannonade such as the world had never before known broke out from Ypres to the Somme, and on 1st July, over a front of twenty-five miles, from Gommécourt to Fay, the Franco-British advance began. The primary objective of the attack was the ridge running from Thiepval to Combles, the final objectives being Bapaume on the British front and Péronne on that of the French. The first day saw a considerable advance on the French sector and on the British centre and right, with particularly sanguinary fighting at Montauban and Contalmaison. By 14th July, after memorable engagements at Mametz and Trônes Woods, the southern spur and lower slopes of the ridge were gained, and by 27th July Delville Wood was captured and the top of the heights reached. The battle now centred at High Wood, and the ultimate capture of this strong-point, after a protracted struggle, cleared the way for a further advance. On 3rd September the French, who had continued to advance on both sides of the Somme, co-operated with the British in an attack on a wide front. The attack was renewed on 22nd September in a united Franco-British action. During this month engagements took place at Ginchy, where the Royal Canadian Horse Artillery saw heavy fighting, Guillemont Farm, Lesboeufs, Courcelette and Gueudecourt (names which occur with frequency in the biographies that follow). By 26th September both Combles and Thiepval, at either end of the ridge, had fallen, and by the middle of October the entire ridge was in the hands of the Allies. The last quarter of the year, however, brought bad weather conditions and a consequent slowing-up of operations. On the Somme front the most notable event was the advance of the left flank and the capture in November of Beaumont-Hamel. The Bank's staff was well represented in this protracted fighting, as may be gathered from the fact that forty members were killed in action on the Somme. Compared with previous actions, however, the loss of life among the Allies was slight in proportion to the magnitude of the fighting; there is little doubt that the enemy's casualties were much greater, including as they did the 56,000 prisoners taken by the Allies from the beginning of the action up to the end of September. On 24th October the French attacked in front of Verdun, and by the middle of December had driven the enemy line back to a maximum depth of four miles; the outer forts were recovered and Verdun definitely saved.

The part played by the Canadian Corps in the Battle of the Somme, though small in comparison with the total series of operations in that theatre, was by no means insignificant. Reinforced by the Fourth Division, which arrived in France in August, the Corps began to move on 1st September from the Ypres salient into Picardy.

On 15th September, the day on which "tanks" first came into action, troops of the Second and Third Divisions stormed and took Courcelette, with the assistance of "Crême de Menthe" and "Cupid," the two tanks on their front.* Mouquet Farm was taken on the night of the 16-17th, and severe fighting continued throughout September north of Courcelette. On 5th October the Fourth Division arrived on the Somme, and during the following fortnight relieved, in conjunction with Imperial units, the other three Divisions. By the end of November, the Fourth had to its credit the taking of two strongly held lines, Regina and Desire trenches, and was moving northwards to join the Canadian Corps on the Arras-Lens front.

1917 The winter of 1916-17 was spent, on the British side, in consolidating the line and harassing the enemy, and on the German side, in preparing for the evacuation of the now untenable salient between the Ancre and the Scarpe. Raids were carried out on all parts of the front against the enemy's trenches, the most successful being those at Armentières, Souchez, Givenchy, Loos, Lens, Arras and Beaumont-Hamel. The Canadian raid on the Fosse Calonne, near Lens, is particularly noted in "Letters from the Front."† In February the British extended their line southwards to Roye, and now held a total length of one hundred and twenty miles, or almost double the length held by them twelve months before. An attack was launched on 17th February on both sides of the Ancre, and by the end of the month the British were within striking distance of Bapaume. Early in March, however, it became evident that the German resistance was only a rearguard action pending the complete withdrawal of their forces to the strongly-fortified belt running in front of Drocourt, Cambrai, St. Quentin and La Fère. The British entered Bapaume on 16th March and Péronne two days later, and at the beginning of April took up their positions opposite the advanced posts of the Hindenburg Line.

The arrangements made by the Allies in November for a 1917 spring offensive in the West, as part of a gigantic assault on all fronts, had to be adjusted to the new situation. Instead of a general drive on the Scarpe-Ancre salient as it existed before the German retreat, the British now projected two major operations which might with success develop into flanking movements of prime importance. The first operation was the turning of the Hindenburg Line on its right flank at Arras, the pivotal point of the enemy's withdrawal. No time was to be lost; the enemy must be caught before the completion of the reserve switch from Drocourt to

Quéant strengthened his defences in this area. The second and later step to be taken was the turning in Flanders of the right flank of the entire German Army. The plans of the French were curtailed but not radically altered by the new situation; their initial attack, however, did not synchronize with that of the British. On the Italian front, operations did not seriously begin until a month after the storm broke in the West.

Arras—Vimy Ridge

On 9th April the battle of Arras began. The brilliant victory of the Canadians at Vimy Ridge on the first day of the fighting was one of the most notable individual successes of the war, and was due in large part to the use for the first time of intense counter-battery fire immediately prior to the infantry assault. "Everything," wrote a member of the Bank's staff who fought in the engagement, "went like clock-work and beyond all expectations."* By the afternoon of the 12th the Canadians were holding the entire ridge, and on the 13th they captured the flanking position of Givenchy-en-Gohelle. Twelve of our staff fell in the struggle for the ridge. The long-coveted possession of Vimy not only provided a jumping-off point for an advance eastwards, but contributed in no small degree to the success of operations further south. Here the enemy resistance centred at the heights of Monchy-le-Preux and the critical Bullecourt-Quéant sector, where the Drocourt switch met the Hindenburg Line. Canadians must experience a peculiar pride in the exploits of the Newfoundlanders at Monchy, during both the original attack and the subsequent gallant defence of the heights, as also in the achievement of the Australians in making a breach in the "Line" at Bullecourt. So successful was the action on the entire front involved, that by 15th April the enemy's positions had been penetrated to a depth of from two to five miles between Lens and Croisilles.

The French offensive was launched on 16th April from Soissons eastwards along the Aisne and the Suippes. The immediate objective on the left was the ridge of the Chemin-des-Dames, on the right that of Moronvilliers, but the intention of the French Command was nothing less than the piercing of the enemy's line and the fighting of a decisive action. It was, in other words, an offensive without a limited objective. After very heavy fighting and against strong counter-attacks, the French won the centre and the eastern end of the Chemin-des-Dames ridge and, by 20th May, the whole of the Moronvilliers massif. Meanwhile, as a means of relieving the pressure on the French front, the British renewed their Arras offensive on 23rd April and again on 3rd May, but the enemy had greatly increased in strength since the battle opened and was ready to dispute every inch of the ground. Desperate fighting took place throughout the sector, notably at Lens, Oppy and Monchy, and south of the Arras-Cambrai road. Bullecourt was the scene of thirteen counter-attacks between the beginning of the offensive and 8th May.

In the fighting of late April and early May the Canadians captured Arleux-en-Gohelle and Roeux, and obtained a temporary footing in Fresnoy. On 3rd June they attacked La Coulotte near Avion and, during the remaining three months that they spent in the Lens sector, carried out many trench raids and surprise attacks, partly as a demonstration to screen the movement of British troops into action at Ypres and to the extreme left of the Allied line at Nieuport, now taken over from the French, partly as a wearing-down process in connection with the investment of Lens. On 15th August the Canadian Corps stormed and took Hill 70 and the western portion of Lens and held them against all counter-attacks. During this fighting, thirteen of our staff gave up their lives. In October the Corps moved northwards to join in the great battle that was proceeding in front of Passchendaele.

Messines

Messines was to the prospective battle of Ypres what Vimy was to the fighting on the Artois front, but its strategic importance was enhanced by the fact that its present occupation by the enemy threatened the British possession of Mount Kemmel, the highest point of the range running east from Mont-des-Cats. On 7th June, the British attacked on a front of ten miles, from Zillebeke to Ploegsteert Wood. For months sappers, including Canadian engineers retained for this purpose during 1916, had been constructing mine-galleries on Hill 60 and at various points along the Messines-Wytschaete ridge. Just before the attack opened the mines were sprung, and the charges rent the hillside and its defences as though they had been match-wood. At the end of the first day Messines and Wytschaete were taken, and by the 14th the entire ridge was in British hands.

The Air Service

The successes at Vimy and Messines were in no small degree due to the superiority of the British air service over that of the enemy. The struggle for supremacy in the air, as well as on land, had been growing keener and keener, and by 1917 the balance of power had passed into Allied hands. The value of this service and the variety of its activities had increased by leaps and bounds, as our letters from airmen at the front clearly show. On sectors engaged in "peace-time" fighting, it was their business to harass the enemy, to bomb his lines of communication and to locate hostile batteries and formations of troops; in England to beat down aerial raiders; at sea to attack U-boats; and later, far within the enemy's country, to bomb his railway centres and his munition plants. All this was in addition to individual engagements with enemy airmen. In France the active co-operation of the air service soon became essential to the success of any offensive. Aerial reconnaissance and photography made possible the training of storm-troops on a specially constructed facsimile of the battle-ground, and imparted valuable information for even minor operations. During advances, in addition to increased scouting, fighting, observation and bombing work, the service now took part in the actual infantry assault, bombing at close range, signalling to the men on the ground, supporting them by Lewis gun fire, and frequently dropping small arms ammunition to advanced parties when its delivery by any other means was impossible. The most mobile arm of the service, with the greatest scope of activities and field for operations, it is little wonder that the story of the air force was regarded as one of the redeeming romances of the war. Among the British airmen who lost their lives on active service were twenty-one of the Bank's staff.

Ypres III

The series of engagements generally referred to as the Third Battle of Ypres opened on 31st July on a total front of fifteen miles. The main assault in this first action extended from Boesinghe to Zillebeke, with the crest of high ground east of Ypres as the limited objective. The British, with the French co-operating on their left, took Pilkem; further south the advance was slower on account of the water-logged condition of the ground and the stiff resistance offered by the enemy, particularly near the Menin road, and it required a fresh attack on the 10th to take Glencorse Wood and the Westhoek ridge. The concrete "pill-box" redoubts of the Germans, first encountered in the Arras-Vimy fighting, had by this time been developed into a system of defence calculated to minimize the effects of artillery preparation, to hold up the most desperate infantry assaults, and to solve the problem of defending a position in depth with the best tactical use of machine-gun fire and the greatest economy of men. The dogged persistence of the British, costly though it was, and their adaptability to new fighting conditions, proved the fallibility of the "pill-box" method of defence, and it was later abandoned in many areas for the old trench system. Its presence, however, in a wilderness of alternating bogs and slimy knolls, amid tree-stumps and ruined farm-houses, and the almost constant rain during every Allied advance, explain why, despite the limited success of their offensive, the actual achievements of the British troops in this Flanders fighting were little short of marvellous.

On 16th August the second phase of the battle, namely, the attempt to turn the enemy's hill-defences from the north, opened with an Allied attack from Inverness Copse on the Menin road northwards to the area west of the Houthulst Forest flooded by the Belgians in 1914. The French, on the left, seized the bridge-head on the Yser Canal; the British took Langemarck but were repulsed at Frezenburg. It was now decided to fight the battle on a wider front, so as to break up the enemy's concentration, and in the following week a considerable advance was made north and east of St. Julien. Meanwhile the bitter struggle for the ridges east of Ypres continued, the Germans offering stout resistance in the vicinity of the Menin road. Bad weather now delayed all but minor operations in the salient, but towards the end of September a vigorous series of attacks in echelon began, with the Passchendaele ridge as the objective. The season for open campaigning was already far advanced, and if the enemy's right flank was to be turned before winter and the way cleared for a movement towards Roulers and Ghent, the taking of the ridge by early October was an imperative necessity. The preliminary covering attack was delivered on 20th September on a wide front, from Langemarck to the Ypres-Comines Canal near Hollebeke; the second attack, that of 26th September, extended from St. Julien to the Menin road; the third attack, on 4th October, took place slightly north of this, with severe fighting north of Langemarck. As a result of these engagements the British, by their capture of Broodseinde, Polygon Wood and the Tower Hamlets ridge, obtained a footing on the southern half of the great broken range of high ground that ran from Passchendaele southwards across the Menin road, and by their capture of the Gravenstafel Spur came within striking distance of Passchendaele itself. The critical moment now arrived when a decision had to be made as to the continuance, in the face of persistent ill-luck, of an offensive costly in sacrifice and attended by only limited success. As at the battle of Arras, the exigencies of the French armies on the Aisne required the continuance of the British campaign, and attacks were made on 9th and 12th October on a British front of six miles and on a French front of three, with the object of turning the enemy's flank at the Houthulst Forest. But it was now clear that the strategic movement behind the campaign could not at this late date be carried out. Tactical defence requirements, however, demanded that the ridge should be in Allied hands before winter.

Passchendaele

Such was the military situation when the Canadians entered the Ypres salient in October, 1917. The last phase of the battle opened on the 22nd with an Allied attack between the Houthulst Forest and Passchendaele. On the 26th French and Belgian troops advanced south and west of the forest and cleared the Merckem peninsula of the enemy. The same day, protected by flank operations at Gheluvelt and north of Poelcappelle, the main British attack was delivered against Passchendaele, and the Third and Fourth Canadian Divisions, with Australians on their right and Imperial troops on their left, made their way through the morass of the Strombeek valley under heavy fire from the "pill-boxes" that dotted the slope. By the end of the day the Bellevue Spur, whence the most deadly fire had come, had been stormed and taken, and on the 30th Meetcheele was captured and held against counter-attacks. On 6th November, the First and Second Canadian Divisions reached the crest of the ridge, taking Passchendaele and the hamlets to the immediate north. The remaining high ground was wrested from the enemy on the 10th, and the Corps was thus able, on leaving this sector for the Lens front, to hand over to the relieving Imperials one of the chief objectives of the autumn's campaign. The heights had been taken and held at a price, and every unit had felt the sacrifice. Among the many who fell on Passchendaele slopes alone were fifteen of the Bank's staff.

The collapse of Russia and her defection from the Allies, together with the serious reverse sustained towards the end of October by the Italians on the Isonzo, had an important bearing upon operations on the Western front during the remainder of 1917. British troops and guns had to be sent to Italy, and the British position strengthened before the transfer of enemy reinforcements from Russia was complete. On the other hand, the French had won a brilliant victory north of the Aisne at La Malmaison and were later to renew with success the campaign at Verdun. Thus every factor, good as well as evil, in the general situation urged immediate action on the part of the British Command. The Passchendaele area was now out of the question as the scene of a new offensive. The ground was well-nigh impassable and a further advance of any moment would mean descending to the mud of the Roulers plain; a successful attempt elsewhere in the Ypres salient was handicapped by the enemy's powerful concentration in this area. It was decided therefore to renew the strategy of the Battle of Arras and to attempt the penetration and turning of the German line in the Quéant sector, at the same time puzzling the enemy by a threat towards Cambrai. On 20th November a surprise attack, without preliminary bombardment, was delivered south-west of Cambrai on a front of six miles, while demonstrations were made over an extensive part of the line, with actual attacks north of Bullecourt and near Epéhy. It was a field day for the "tanks," and they performed their work admirably, destroying the wire and overcoming organized resistance in the original lines. The assault was a complete tactical success and, considering the severity of the village fighting, the subsequent advance was rapid. At the end of the first day the Hindenburg main and reserve lines were broken through on a front of ten miles and to a depth at the furthest point of four and a half miles. The Canadian Cavalry Brigade took part in the advance, and a squadron of the Fort Garry Horse greatly distinguished itself by entering Masnières and capturing a German battery.

An acute salient had now been created in the vicinity of Marcoing and Masnières, and the insecure position of the British across the Scheldt Canal called for a widening of the salient in a northerly direction and, with a view to present defence as well as to future offensive operations on the Sensée, the capture of the important ridge on which stood Bourlon Wood. On the following day progress was made in this direction and a frontal attack delivered on Bourlon Wood, where severe fighting took place until the 24th, and again on the 27th. The defensive position of the British was now better than it had been after the first day's fighting but, as compared with the original front, it was if anything weaker, both by reason of the increased length of line without a corresponding increase in garrison, and owing to the nature of the salient itself, especially at its southern end, where the water-sheds of the Scheldt valley interrupted the arc and left the way open for penetration by an enemy attacking in any strength. It was, in fact, here that the Germans broke through when they counter-attacked on 30th November, whereas the centre and left in the main stood firm, even under the attacks in mass formation at Moeuvres and the intense gas-shelling at Bourlon Wood. Gouzeaucourt fell, but was recaptured the same day after a gallant attack in which the Guards took part. By a series of necessary tactical retirements the British position was corrected and by 7th December established in the Hindenburg reserve line captured on the first day of the British offensive. Winter now set in, and apart from minor operations here and at Lens and Passchendaele, the British front was for the next few months ominously quiet.

The lull on the Western front that followed the double operations about Cambrai was accounted for, on the Allied side, by an assumption of defensive tactics pending the arrival of United States reinforcements, and on the part of the enemy, by preparation for the supreme triumph of German arms, the "Kaiser's Battle."
1918 By the end of January, 1918, the British had taken over from the French the St. Quentin front as far south as the Oise, an additional twenty-eight miles, and this further charge, together with the increase in frontage due to the salients created in 1917, not only made a heavy drain upon available reserves of man-power but left lightly garrisoned what proved to be the most vulnerable parts of the line. On 21st March the long-expected and much-heralded enemy offensive began on a front of fifty-four miles, extending from the Sensée to the Oise. In their method of attack, the Germans adopted the surprise tactics taught them by the British at Cambrai. A concentrated counter-battery fire of gas and high explosive put a large proportion of the British artillery out of action, and the enemy, protected by thick fog and heavy barrage, swarmed through the breaches made in the thinly-held line by the intense drum-fire that prefaced the assault, and succeeded by a series of flank movements in compelling a strategic retirement of the Allied line to within forty miles of Paris and of Calais, and within ten of the British railhead at Amiens. The heroic stand made by the hard-pressed British troops on the first day of this battle is typified by the "most conspicuous bravery" of Second Lieutenant Edmund De Wind, late of the Edmonton staff of the Bank and an officer in the Royal Irish Rifles, who was mortally wounded while defending the Race Course Redoubt at Grougie,* two miles south of St. Quentin on the east bank of the Crozat Canal, and was awarded the Victoria Cross for the devotion which cost him his life. Seven other members of the staff fell in action during these critical days in March.

German Offensive (March)

The primary object of the German campaign was to separate the British and French Armies by penetrating the line at their point of junction, and to drive home this blow by the capture of Amiens and Abbeville; the British must then either choose to fight a decisive battle with their backs to the sea, or withdraw south of the Somme, leaving the Channel ports open to the enemy. The main points of impact on 21st March were east of Péronne, north-east of Bapaume and between St. Quentin and La Fère. By noon the British line in these sectors had been penetrated to a depth of from two to three miles, and on the following day the enemy entered the third zone of British defences. With its right insecure owing to the withdrawal west of La Fère, the Fifth Army was forced to give up the Péronne bridgehead, and, under cover of a well-fought rearguard action, took up its position on the west bank of the Somme. French reinforcements, in the absence of mobile British reserves, virtually saved the situation; on 24th March the French relieved the British of the line from St. Quentin to the Oise. During the withdrawal, however, a gap had occurred south of St.

Quentin, which enabled the enemy to break through and take Ham, while the British position in the north was penetrated near Croisilles. On the following day a gap south of Bapaume afforded still another opportunity for a thrust and the line had to be corrected by a withdrawal behind Bapaume and, when Courcelette was captured, to the upper Ancre. Thus in one day was lost Thiepval ridge, and with it all the advantage gained in 1916 by the Battle of the Somme. The line now crossed the Somme at Bray, where the British right had rested two years before. By an unfortunate blunder, however, on the part of a local commander, a withdrawal was ordered on the 26th to the confluence of the Ancre and the Somme, and this was partially carried out. With its flank now in the air, the British right was forced to uncover Albert; the French, seriously affected by the capture of Nesle on the 26th, had likewise to conform to the general movement and, in spite of desperate fighting, lost two days later the important railhead of Montdidier. The line was now becoming stabilized, and the last attempt made by the enemy to extend the Montdidier salient towards Paris ended in failure on 30th March. The German thrust in the southern sector had lost its momentum, and whatever might happen in the north, there were now two factors that conduced to a more favourable situation—reinforcements had arrived, and the Allied Commands on the Western front had been united in the person of Marshal Foch.

On 9th April began the Battle of the Lys, the second phase of the great enemy offensive. Halted south of the Scarpe at Hebuterne, at Villers-Bretonneux and at Montdidier, the Germans now turned their attention to the sector north of the La Bassée canal, whence British troops had been sent to fill the depleted ranks on the Oise. The objectives of the attack were Hazebrouck and the Channel ports, and the isolation of the British Army in Flanders. Having bombarded the Lens-Armentières sector with gas shells on the previous night, the enemy penetrated the line just south of Armentières and, after considerable fighting, forced a retirement across the Lys and Lawe rivers. A break was also effected between Ploegsteert and Messines, which led to the capture of the entire ridge, the turning of Armentières from the north and the opening of the way to Hazebrouck. On 13th April a stand was made in front of the Nieppe Forest, but two days later Bailleul fell. By the 16th Wytschaete was in German hands, and a general withdrawal from Passchendaele and advanced points in the Ypres salient had become necessary. The struggle now centred about Kemmel, where an attack was repulsed on the 17th. On 28th April, however, Kemmel was taken and, as a result, a further shortening of the Ypres salient was carried out. A number of attempts were made during the next few days to turn Ypres from the south, but the general line from this point to Kemmel was maintained and the northern drive definitely halted. Meanwhile the attack on Amiens developed, and Villers-Bretonneux was the centre of a number of engagements which ended not only in the retention of this village by the Australians, but in a considerable improvement of the British position on this sector. Minor actions were fought on various parts of the front during May and June, of which the general outcome was distinctly favourable to the Allies.

In order to secure more ground for manoeuvring against Amiens, and also to prepare the way for a drive on Paris, the enemy on 6th April attacked the French salient on the Oise east of Noyon, and within the next few days advanced to the line of the Ailette. Towards the end of May the ridge of the Chemin-des-Dames was occupied and a movement developed against Rheims, which, though held against all frontal attacks, was nevertheless threatened by the fall of Soissons on 29th May, and the arrival of the enemy on the Marne between Château-Thierry and Dormans. At the same time a strong assault was delivered by the enemy on the twenty-two mile front between Montdidier and Noyon, with the object of crushing in the Compiègne salient. The success of the double drive thus launched against Paris was primarily dependent upon a broadening of the salient on the Marne by the capture of Rheims, and on 15th and 17th July attacks were delivered on a front of fifty miles from Château-Thierry to a point east of Rheims, the only result of which was the withdrawal of the Allied line a couple of miles south of the Marne; the Rheims sector was still intact. On 18th July the Allies began their counter-offensive, known as the Second Battle of the Marne, in which British, American and Italian soldiers fought side by side with those of France. The enemy's failure at Rheims, in conjunction with his advance across the Marne, had left him in a salient too narrow in proportion to its depth, and especially vulnerable on its western flank. It was here, between Soissons and Château-Thierry, that the Allied attack was launched. North of the Ourcq, it was attended with immediate and overwhelming success, the enemy's positions being penetrated to a depth of five miles. Further south the advance was slower, but on the 20th Château-Thierry was taken and on the 23rd Oulchy-le-Château. Under cover of stiff resistance north of the Ourcq and strong counter-attacks at Dormans, the Germans now prepared for the evacuation of the salient and by 27th July their retreat was well under way. From the Marne the enemy was driven to the Ourcq and thence on 3rd August, after the capture of Soissons, to the line of the Aisne and the Vesle. Meanwhile the French had gained ground north of Montdidier and were firmly established on the west bank of the Avre. In front of Amiens, harassed by constant raids and attacks, the enemy had abandoned his advanced positions and withdrawn some distance from the Ancre, while in the Hazebrouck area his attacks had been repulsed with heavy loss. The tide had definitely turned, and the initiative had everywhere passed into the hands of the Allies. The military genius of Marshal Foch had seized upon the German advance across the Marne as the psychological moment for the great battle, which, by creating a new enemy salient to the north, opened the way for the culminating Allied offensive of the war.

Marne II

The Canadian Corps had spent the winter of 1917-1918 on the Lens sector, between Hill 70 and Acheville, and had greatly improved the Vimy defences in view of the expected enemy offensive, which threatened the coalfields lying to the north-west of the ridge. The March drive left this sector untouched, but the personnel of the Corps was largely concerned in the wholesale shifting of troops entailed by the Franco-British scheme of defence. On the night of the 22nd-23rd March, one of the Canadian Motor Machine Gun Brigades was ordered to proceed to the Fifth Army front, where, in conjunction with the infantry, it fought a series of stubborn rearguard actions before Maricourt and a number of points between the Somme and the Avre. On 24th March the Corps took over the line at Arras to which the British had withdrawn on the flank of the main attack, and shortly afterwards extended its front north and south of this sector, to such a degree, indeed, that during the battle of the Lys it had to veil its weakness by raids and artillery demonstrations. During May and June, with the exception of one division retained in the line, the Corps was placed in General Headquarters Reserve and underwent intensive training in the offensive tactics of open warfare. On 15th July, it took over once more the Arras front and made preparations for an attack on Orange Hill, just west of Monchy-le-Preux, which were continued as a feint during the period immediately preceding the Battle of Amiens. Similarly, in order to deceive the enemy, two Canadian battalions were put into the line in the Kemmel area. On 2nd August the Corps was relieved at Arras and secretly concentrated behind Amiens. The plans of the Allied Command required the release of the lateral lines of communication from possession or pressure by the enemy, as the preliminary step before a general offensive could successfully be carried out. In this connection the rôle of the British was to relieve the pressure on Amiens and to free the Paris-Amiens railway. The attack of the 8th was, therefore, in its inception a local operation, but the success which it met with from the very outset converted it into a movement which not only reduced the enemy salient on the Somme, but ensured the satisfactory carrying out of future operations aiming at the St. Quentin-Cambrai line. With the British established between these two points, a further advance might be possible to Mons and Maubeuge, the possession of which would threaten the enemy's most important forward lines of communication, while a successful movement of the French and Americans converging at Mézières would deprive him of his main lateral line.

Amiens

On 8th August the British attacked on a front of eleven miles, from Albert to the Amiens-Roye road, the French extending the battle from here southwards for about five miles. The Canadian Corps, occupying the centre right of the attack, advanced between the Australians and the French, and exploited success so well that by the end of the first day it had penetrated the enemy's position to a maximum depth of eight miles. Stubborn resistance was encountered at Le Quesnel, but this point was carried on the night of the 8-9th, and on the following day a further penetration of five miles was effected. Progress north of the Amiens-Roye road now became slower, for the old trench systems used in the Somme fighting of 1916 afforded the enemy good defensive positions, and on the 17th the British advance was halted in front of Chaulnes and Roye, where the enemy made a determined stand. The Canadians had by this date advanced fourteen miles at the farthest point; this was the greatest depth gained on the British battle-front. Amiens was now definitely safe, and the Corps was withdrawn from the line and moved once more to Arras. In this notable series of actions, which marked Canada's entry into the last phase of the war, six of our staff gave up their lives. The French occupied Montdidier on 10th August, and, striking northwards, took Lassigny on the 21st, thus threatening Noyon from the west as well as from the south.

Bapaume

The enemy had by this time adopted a defensive policy everywhere on the Western front; in rapid succession he abandoned his forward positions in the Lys valley and to the north of Kemmel, evacuated Albert and the plateau five miles west of Bapaume, and finally, on the 18th, began a general retirement to the Hindenburg Line. The Allied drive was now transferred to the north, re-opening on 23rd August on a front of thirty-three miles from Lihons, where the left flank of the Canadian Corps had rested at the conclusion of the Battle of Amiens, to Mercatel, three miles south of Arras. The evacuation by the enemy of the slight salient and plateau referred to above brought the British in touch with the Albert-Arras railway and offered an opportunity to drive a wedge from the north in conjunction with the French operations in the south. In the course of this Battle of Bapaume, the enemy positions on the Thiepval ridge were carried on the 24th, and on the following day Courcelette fell. The pressure against the Hindenburg Line further north helped to accelerate the retirement of the enemy, Bapaume falling into British hands on the 28th, while on the French front Roye, Chaulnes, Nesle and Noyon were recovered and the enemy driven to the line of the Somme and the Canal du Nord. With the capture by the Australians of Péronne on 1st September the enemy salient on the Somme had practically vanished.

The time had now come for a direct assault upon the elaborate system of enemy defences which extended from Lille to Rheims. Of this system the Hindenburg Line from Douai to Laon, with its numerous ramifications, was only a part. Crossing this deep belt of organized defences at an acute angle was the canal system of Northern France, which by its roughly parallel lines of the Haute Deule-Nord-Somme and the Scheldt-St. Quentin-Crozat, formed a strong protective screen for the Hindenburg Line south of Cambrai and a reserve defence north of that city. The penetration of this two-fold system at its crucial points would entail a complete re-adjustment of the enemy's line in Flanders, a situation which Allied attacks delivered in that sector, even over a wide front, had hitherto failed to bring about, partly because the Allied line in Flanders already formed a vulnerable salient, partly because of the virtual impossibility of exploiting success over water-logged ground. Moreover, a successful operation north of the Somme, aiming at Mons and Maubeuge, in conjunction with one in the Argonne aiming at Mézières, would result in a double encircling movement that would leave the main German Army no room for manoeuvre and would necessitate capitulation, from the worst features of which it was saved only by the declaration of an armistice by the time these objectives had been reached.

Arras

On 26th August, in conjunction with the offensive on the right against Bapaume, and the advance by "peaceful penetration" on the left in the salient of the Lys, the attack on the Hindenburg Line was launched from Gavrelle to Mercatel. In this series of engagements, the Canadian Corps, occupying the post of honour astride the Arras-Cambrai road, fought, as our letters indicate and as the Corps Commander himself says in his report, "the hardest battle in its history." The difficult nature of the ground, with its ridges, rivers and canals, was accentuated by the strength of the enemy's positions, but by the end of the first day, Orange Hill, Monchy-le-Preux and Guémappe were taken, and on the 27th further good progress was made south of the Scarpe. North of that river Gavrelle and Roeux were taken by Imperial troops, but their advance was now held up in front of the Fresnes-Rouvroy switch. Halting under similar conditions, the Canadians postponed their attack on the Drocourt-Quéant line until the heavy artillery had been concentrated on the wire defences. On 2nd September, the decisive assault was made. Under a dense barrage and supported by tanks the Canadians broke through this line, capturing, after stiff resistance, Dury and Cagnicourt. By the loss of the latter place and of Buissy, the enemy was compelled to retire behind the Canal du Nord. During the next three weeks, preparations were made for an attack on the dry section of the canal south of the Arras-Cambrai road, and on 27th September, reinforced by Imperial troops, the Canadian Corps carried the line of the canal from Inchy to Marquion, capturing the latter and Bourlon village, and deploying between the Sensée Canal and Cambrai. Here they repulsed a number of strong counter-attacks and continued a slow advance to a line running north from Cambrai, which was reached on 1st October. It was now decided that the Corps should force a crossing of the Scheldt Canal north of Cambrai and thus complete the investment of that city.

Drocourt-Quéant Line

Canal du Nord

Meanwhile on the right of these operations, an attack was proceeding against the outposts of the main Hindenburg Line. On 12th September, Havrincourt, near the junction of the Canal du Nord and the fortified zone, was captured and on the 17th several gains were made near St. Quentin. On 18th September, on a front of seventeen miles, from Gouzeaucourt to Holnon, with the French operating from Holnon southwards, the British attacked the enemy's advance posts, overcoming a stiff resistance at Epéhy and rendering abortive a counter-attack delivered between Gouzeaucourt and Moeuvres on the right flank of the Canadian Corps. Hard fighting occurred at Epéhy on the 20th which resulted in the clearing of the area between that point and Lempire. On the 27th, preceded by an artillery bombardment along the front of three British armies, and acting in conjunction with the Canadians on their left, Imperial troops, with some American divisions, stormed and carried the Hindenburg Line between the two canal systems, and crossed the Scheldt Canal at several points. The enemy's position in St. Quentin was now untenable and on 18th October British troops occupied the town. In the two days that followed, the Hindenburg Line east of the St. Quentin Canal was penetrated at Le Catelet and Sequhart, and the Allies now entered a country that had nothing but natural obstacles to delay their advance.

Epéhy

St. Mihiel

Still further south, the Franco-American forces were continuing an offensive begun on 5th September, and by the middle of the month had advanced to the general line held before the German spring drive. On the 12th and 13th, the Americans succeeded in flattening the St. Mihiel salient, and were now threatening the railways of Lorraine, upon which the enemy depended for his communications with southern Germany. On 26th September, the French and Americans attacked on a forty-mile front in Champagne and made considerable progress against very stubborn resistance. This offensive had the far-reaching strategic result of drawing the enemy reserves away from the more northerly sectors, which he could better afford to leave lightly defended. The spirit of the offensive had in the space of two months entirely vanished from the German morale; only that of the defensive remained. The northern front, valuable as a jumping-off point for a drive to the Channel ports, to Amiens and to Paris, was now of secondary importance compared with the front in Lorraine, where a powerful attack would threaten the very existence of the German Army. Moreover, the enemy's luck was failing him in the other theatres of war, and the next few weeks were to witness the collapse of two of his allies. On 29th September the Bulgarian army capitulated, and two days later Damascus fell and negotiations began for an armistice between Turkey and the Entente powers. Abandoned by her friends, with her reserves of man-power diminishing almost as rapidly as American reinforcements were increasing, Germany saw no military solution other than a retirement to a shortened winter line of defence, where the issue might be delayed at least until the spring of 1919. To anticipate this movement, the Allies made every effort to exploit the success already gained.

Champagne

Capitulation of Bulgaria and Turkey

The battles of Bapaume, Epéhy, Arras-Cambrai, the Champagne and St. Mihiel were in fact all part of one gigantic offensive against the last fortified positions of the enemy, which he might well regard, after four years of occupation, as almost impregnable. The main blow was being directed frontally at the heart of the German system of communication, and, as the opportunity presented itself, flanking movements were developed north and south of the steady pressure in the centre. The plan of operations from Arras northwards had to take into account Lille and the important industrial area that surrounded it. For this reason, Allied activity between Arras and Ypres was confined to following up the enemy as he withdrew in conformity with the general movement forced upon him by the pressure in the south, or to minor set-piece attacks upon a very limited front. The complete evacuation of the Lys salient by the enemy and the recapture by the British of Mount Kemmel at the end of August cleared the way for the great outflanking movement that was to extend from Ypres to the sea. On 28th September the northern contribution to the general battle began with an attack delivered on a front of twenty-three miles from Dixmude to Ploegsteert, the British on the right from Ypres southwards, the Franco-Belgian force on the left or northern sector, and the British navy operating off the Belgian coast. In the course of five days' fighting the Houthulst Forest was cleared of the enemy, Roulers seriously threatened and the Lys crossed at Comines. The withdrawal of the Germans from the country between Armentières and Lens, as a result of these operations, still further reduced the Lille salient and made the fall of that city only a matter of time. Lens fell on 3rd October, but Douai still held out, protected by one of the few sections of the Hindenburg Line as yet unpenetrated. A fresh offensive was begun on the 14th from Dixmude to Comines, and within a few days the Allies had taken Courtrai, Roulers and Ostend, and by the 18th had encircled and passed Lille and the adjacent cities of Roubaix and Tourcoing.

Flanders

The task imposed upon the Canadian Corps was that of crossing the Scheldt Canal and turning Cambrai from the north, while other British troops operated to the south. In spite of strong counter-attacks delivered between the Sensée and Scheldt Canals, the Canadians made progress on the left of Cambrai. On the night of 8-9th October, in conjunction with the general attack delivered from here to St. Quentin, to which reference has been made above, the Canadians stormed the Scheldt Canal and crossed just north-east of Cambrai. In the subsequent fighting the city was cleared of the enemy and the Corps captured the high ground to the east, forcing the Germans to evacuate the angle between the Sensée and Scheldt Canals. The progress of events was now rapid; one after another the enemy's positions were abandoned, while the momentum of the Allied advance increased each day. The French and Americans were now advancing on both sides of the Meuse, Laon was evacuated, the Chemin-des-Dames was cleared, Le Cateau fell, and the enemy was driven to the Selle. On 11th October the Canadian Corps took over the line of the Sensée Canal where it runs east and west. The First Canadian Division, operating further west towards the Scarpe, stormed the Quéant-Drocourt switch at Sailly-en-Ostravent and reached the line of the Sensée Canal where it runs north towards Douai. On the 17th the Canadian Corps crossed the canal and, joining hands with other British troops which had entered the town from the west, advanced in the direction of Valenciennes. The force of the attack at first carried all before it, but after the loss of Denain on the 19th, the Germans offered a stiffer resistance and retarded the movement of the flanking units. By nightfall on the 22nd, however, practically the whole of the Forest of Raismes was in Canadian hands and the Corps had reached the Scheldt Canal at all points. As the canal, however, was held by the enemy in strength, and as the Corps had already thrown back its northern flank a considerable distance, it was considered advisable to effect the capture of Valenciennes by an attack from the south.

Cambrai

The change within the last few months, from trench or semi-open warfare in fortified zones, through deserted and ruined villages and over uncultivated fields, to campaigning in an inhabited country barely touched by shell-fire, made a deep impression upon the British soldier. The progress of the Canadian Corps from Douai to Mons meant the liberation not only of towns and villages but of the civilians whom the enemy had been forced by pressure of time to leave in possession, and whose presence no doubt hampered his military movements. "The other day," writes an officer in one of our Letters, "I captured with my company a small village, and as we entered the town and as the Boche withdrew, women ran from the houses and embraced us even while we were still under the enemy machine gun fire, and wept for joy. It was most ludicrous when one considered the work we were employed on, but the joy of these people who had been under the Prussian heel for four years was very pitiable. Now as we go forward, the same scenes greet us at each town we pass through."* Another writes, "We are having a glorious advance. . . Every house you go near, you are hauled in and made drink black coffee till you can hardly see. . . . You can't imagine what it is like to get in a decent town and see civilians again, and to get into a bed with sheets, after two months' continuous fighting."† There is, of course, the other side of the picture, the silent villages that had come under artillery fire and the traces of battle that still lingered in a scarred countryside, "empty streets, shuttered houses . . . railway lines torn up . . . women and children (some lay dead, gassed by the Germans in the houses) on lorries and in dog-drawn carts. On the hillsides and in sunken roads dead Germans, snipers in ploughed fields, and mixed with our own men lying thick in the sunken roads."‡

The operations of the Canadian Corps from Douai eastwards formed the left flank of the main British offensive, which aimed at Maubeuge. The capture of Valenciennes and the subsequent advance of the Corps, culminating in the entry into Mons on the eve of the armistice, had an important bearing upon the situation on the Scheldt. The middle of October saw the retirement of the Germans from the Belgian coast, and Zeebrugge and Bruges were liberated on the 19th of the month. The Franco-Belgian forces were pressing towards Ghent and Audenarde, while a British Army on the right drove the enemy to the Scheldt, where he rallied. After the fall of Valenciennes, however, Tournai had to be evacuated and the British crossed the Scheldt on a considerable front. Further south the enemy made a stand on the Selle, but was driven from here on 20th October. The loss of the Selle marked the beginning of the end of the German empire. The tentative peace overtures made by the enemy earlier in the month were met on the 23rd by definite stipulations as to the conditions upon which an armistice would be granted by the Allies. Four days later, Austria, the last of Germany's allies, suffered a decisive defeat on the Upper Piave and on 3rd November signed an armistice with Italy. On 4th November, in the Western theatre of operations, the only one now remaining, the last great offensive of the war took place on a British front of thirty miles, with the centre of the attack opposite the Forest of Mormal, midway between Le Cateau and Maubeuge. In spite of formidable resistance, the British advanced five miles the first day. Further south the French continued the attack, while the Americans penetrated the enemy defences in the eastern Argonne. The armistice thus found the Allies in possession of the strategic objectives of Maubeuge and Mézières and of Sedan, where the entry of French and American troops avenged the disaster of 1870.

Armistice with Austria

Likewise, it was the role of the Canadian Corps to avenge the retreat of the "Contemptibles" in the black days of August, 1914, and their advance on Mons, in conjunction with that of Imperial troops on Maubeuge, will always occupy an outstanding place in the memories that have survived the Great War. On 1st November an attack was launched by the Canadians upon Valenciennes from the south, where the line already ran east of the Scheldt Canal. At the same time the canal was crossed north of the city. Valenciennes was cleared of the enemy on the following day, and the right flank made good progress. On the left, however, the inundations made the going very difficult, and from the 3rd to the 7th the Canadian Corps was subjected to very heavy counter-attacks and met with stout resistance on the part of the enemy, who was now trying to keep himself from being hemmed in by the canal and marshy ground between Condé and Mons. Continuing across the Belgian frontier, the Corps entered a thickly populated country similar to the coal-mining area of Lens, as it was in pre-war days. On the right of the Canadians, other British troops entered Bavai on the 7th and Maubeuge on the following day. On the 7th, the Canadians extended their operations north of the Condé-Mons Canal in order to protect their flank, and continued their progress in the face of strong opposition. The enemy, although disorganized, was fighting for time and endeavouring by means of rearguard actions to delay the advance. The southwest outskirts of Mons were reached by the morning of the 10th and by midnight an entrance into the town itself was effected. By daybreak on the memorable 11th November, the machine gun nests were wiped out and Mons was cleared of the enemy, and when hostilities ceased at eleven o'clock that morning, the outposts of the Canadian Corps were established some miles further east. With their comrades-in-arms on the long line that stood still, as though by enchantment, that armistice morning, they faced eastwards in readiness for the triumphal march to the bridgeheads of the Rhine. In that hour, too, they remembered their comrades still suffering in German prisons, and those who had given their lives on the field of honour in the last great advance. Of the two hundred and sixty members of the Bank's staff who died on active service, thirty perished on the long road from Arras to Mons.

Nursing Service

No summary of the Bank's war record would be complete without a special reference to the women members of our staff who served with hospital units in France and England. One nursing sister writes* that she and her two colleagues were called upon to attend no less than two hundred and ninety-one operations in ten days during the German advance in the spring of 1918. The seven who went from the Bank to nurse the sick and wounded and to assist the surgeon in the field have made a valuable contribution to the work of mercy begun half a century ago by Florence Nightingale.

Other Theatres of War

During the four years of fighting on the Western front, where over a thousand of the Bank's staff were at one time or another actively engaged, several members were serving in other theatres of war. Some of the latter, after sharing in the tragic adventure of Gallipoli, were transferred to France or to the grim fighting in Salonika at Lake Doiron. Two of the staff died in Mesopotamia, one of them falling in action during the gallant attempt to relieve Kut-el-Amara in April, 1916. A few served in Egypt during the early days when a Turkish advance from Syria threatened the Suez Canal, or took part in the liberation of Palestine in 1917. At least one member fought with the Russians in the Caucasus, and later witnessed the collapse of Roumania in the Dobrudja. A number helped to quell native risings in India, or took part in the conquest of German East Africa. Others served in British units sent to the aid of Italy in 1917, one with the French Army in the Aisne fighting earlier that year, and still others on the Dvina front or with the Canadian forces in Siberia during the winter of 1918-19.

The Navy

Throughout the war, moreover, members of the Bank's staff were to be found in the Royal Navy and its subsidiary services, engaged in mine-sweeping, patrolling the Atlantic and Pacific, the North Sea and the Mediterranean, escorting convoys and serving on the mystery ships, or Q-boats, that lured German submarines to their fate. The work of the Navy, silent but effective, cannot receive its due meed of honour, unless it is realized how far its operations destroyed the morale and drained the vitality of the enemy behind his battle-front, and how it brought about, in conjunction with the Allied Armies, the utter collapse of the German war-machine in the very hour of its boasted victory.

Appointed
A Companion
of
The Distinguished Service Order

"For conspicuous gallantry and ability north-east of Cambrai, 10th/11th October, 1918. The success of his Battalion in two successive days' operations was largely due to his exercise of control, initiative and determination. Working from an advanced position, he on two occasions carried out daring preliminary reconnaissances, and arranged all details for the impending attacks, exposing himself continually to heavy fire." (Second Supplement to the London Gazette, 3rd October, 1919.)

Awarded

THE MILITARY CROSS

(In Command of Calonne Raid)

"He displayed great courage in leading his men against superior numbers of the enemy. He set a fine example to his men and succeeded in capturing a number of prisoners." (London Gazette.)

Appointed

"For conspicuous gallantry and devotion to duty in leading his platoon in an attack. On reaching his objective he came under heavy fire from a machine-gun. Taking two men with him, he immediately rushed forward, personally killed the gun crew, and then noticing that a booby trap was attached to the gun, he threw it backwards, on which the trap exploded. He then brought in the gun. During this operation he was wounded, but refused to leave his platoon, and later in the day, while on a reconnaissance with two N.C.O.'s, he met a party of the enemy, all of whom were killed. On the following morning this officer led his platoon in the open against a strong enemy counter-attack, and, after heavy hand-to-hand fighting, in which he personally accounted for several of the enemy, and was severely wounded, the attack was repulsed. His fearlessness throughout was most marked."

Awarded

The Victoria Cross

"For most conspicuous bravery and self-sacrifice on the 21st March, 1918, at the Race Course Redoubt, near Grougie.

"For seven hours he held this most important post, and though twice wounded and practically single-handed, he maintained his position until another section could be got to his help.

"On two occasions, with two N.C.O.'s only, he got out on top under heavy machine-gun and rifle fire, and cleared the enemy out of the trench, killing many.

"He continued to repel attack after attack until he was mortally wounded and collapsed. His valour, self-sacrifice and example were of the highest order."

(Supplement to the London Gazette, 15th May, 1919.)

Killed in Action at St. Quentin, 21st March, 1918.

Note: St. Quentin was the scene of the fiercest fighting of the Great German Drive on the 21st March, 1918. Mr. De Wind's Company was in the front line at that time and the Officer Commanding his Battalion, Lieutenant-Colonel Cole-Hamilton (who himself was taken prisoner the same day), pays tribute to his "great courage and magnificent fighting at the head of his platoon."

We are informed that the British Government has presented a captured German gun to the village of Comber (his birthplace) as a memento of his heroism.

Enlisted, 23rd March, 1917, from Galt branch, in Royal Air Force, with the rank of Second Lieutenant.

Died in Leeds Hospital, England, July, 1918.

"He was most popular with all his brother officers and I held the highest opinion of him both as an officer and also as a gentleman.

"I am of opinion that his death was due to his trying to carry on with his work without reporting sick. When he finally reported that he was ill, he was sent into Hospital and had every attention, but, it was too late, gangrene had set in and there was practically no chance of saving his life. Adhesions, resulting from an operation for appendicitis, had been the cause of much ill health. I saw him in Hospital the morning after the operation, he was quite cheerful and did not realize that he was seriously ill. He said to me: 'It will be some time before I am at work again'."—His Commanding Officer.

Note: Second Lieutenant Gibson had been in bad health for some years, and made several unsuccessful attempts to enlist before he was finally accepted.

Awarded

The Military Cross

"For marked gallantry and initiative on September 2nd, 1918. He was in charge of a single gun which advanced in close support of the infantry. During the whole day, under heavy fire, he kept close with the advance. When the infantry were held up in front of Villers-lez-Cagnicourt by machine-gun fire from woods, he turned his gun on these woods so successfully that half an hour later the infantry swept through with hardly a casualty. Later, coming across several enemy 77 mm. guns, he turned two of them about and did good execution against enemy personnel and transport, inflicting heavy casualties." (Supplement to the London Gazette, 30th July, 1919.)

Wounded (slight), in the hand and jaw, Passchendaele, 9th November, 1917; wounded (severe)—left arm blown off and right shoulder injured—Canal du Nord, 27th September, 1918. Returned to duty with the Bank, 20th November, 1919. 264.

Killed in Action, 26th September, 1916.

Note: The Chaplain of his Battalion describes Lieutenant Gordon's death as follows:

"He fell in one of the grandest charges ever made. It was at eleven o'clock at night when they rallied all that was left of the Battalion (about 120 men) to take an enemy trench. It had been attempted earlier in the day but barbed wire and machine-guns held them up. Charles took charge of a few men and advanced at the head of them. He fell, but his men gained their objective."

THE MILITARY CROSS

"For conspicuous gallantry and devotion to duty. This officer, with another, made a daring reconnaissance of the Brigade zone, being continually sniped from high ground and trees. They obtained the exact location of the Infantry when the information was urgently required and cleared up an obscure situation." (London Gazette, December 2nd, 1918.)

Returned to duty with the Bank, 2nd September, 1919.

NOTE: We quote the following from a letter from Mr. Gossage, written at Rosrath, near Cologne, after the entry of the Canadian Corps into Germany:

"As far as I can make out the feeling of relief that the war is over overcomes any of their feelings, and, of course, it is policy to be nice to a conquering army, but the thing which we expected and which we have seen very little of is sullenness. Treachery, of course, I think is out of the question as it would be fatal for the country. The stores are all well stocked but prices are terrible, 1,000 marks for a suit of clothes, 125 marks for boots, etc., an egg 2 marks (50c. pre-war)." 302.

Note: We are indebted to Mr. Grover for the following account of a phase of the taking of Hill 70 by the Canadian Corps in August, 1917:

"The 29th Battalion had been in the trenches six days when ordered to make this attack. There had been a previous attack on 15th August, 1917, in which the 4th and 5th Brigades advanced about two miles. We were supporting the advancing party. On the 21st we went over to capture the last German trench in front of the city of Lens. On arriving at the German trench we found it manned by the Prussian Guards, who put up a very stiff fight, and in some parts came from their positions to meet us. I saw, myself, thirteen of my own men shot down by snipers. It took us more than a day, steady fighting, to wrest this trench from the Guards.

"After this battle, sixty-five men of the 29th Battalion answered Roll Call."

NOTE: The late Mr. Harrison was well known in athletic circles in Vancouver, as a keen boxer, oarsman and swimmer.

We are indebted to Mr. F. E. Harrison (father of the late Mr. C. D. Harrison) for the following particulars of the tragic accident which caused his death. The extract is from a letter written by the Commandant of the Royal Air Force Camp at Denham:

"His death was due to cerebral hemorrhage consequent to a fall. He was boxing in a tournament with a fellow cadet in the penultimate bout, and was winning on all points when a blow from his opponent made him stagger, and in recovering his balance, his foot slipped, and he fell backwards, striking his head on the floor, and was rendered unconscious, in which condition he was taken to hospital, where he passed away several hours later. It was his kismet—he was enjoying his life, his work, his play and his surroundings, and died just as much for his country as any man who laid down his life on the battlefield."

"On September 27th, 1918, while following closely behind the attacking troops, he came across a company which was badly disorganized through having lost all its officers. He promptly took them in hand and in spite of heavy shell and machine-gun fire, led them through the village. The situation at this stage was very critical and his prompt action enabled the battalion commander to reinforce the line and repel a strong enemy counter-attack."

"At Sailly-en-Ostrevent, on 8th October, 1918, he was given the undertaking of getting his company across the river Trinquis, to form a bridgehead for use in later operations. He got his men across a narrow plank bridge, and then moved them into assembly positions. At dawn he made a surprise attack, gallantly leading his men forward in face of heavy fire, and succeeded in capturing 25 of the enemy and three machine-guns. He established a bridgehead in the face of the enemy, and held it against three heavy enemy counter-attacks."

"He displayed great bravery in leading his platoon in the advance, and fine initiative in bringing them forward to the front of the attack when the troops that were intended for the first wave became involved in heavy fighting on the flanks. His readiness to do this work proved of great value in maintaining a well connected front. On arrival at the objective he quickly carried out his consolidation under very active machine-gun fire. This work was no sooner done than he received orders to take over the command of "B" Company which had lost all its officers and all but twenty-four of its men, and was responsible for a difficult front of five hundred yards. He took over these duties with energy and quick appreciation of the situation. By skilful disposition of his men he made that front secure. Throughout the day he continued to display the same fine courage and disregard of danger, and inflicted many casualties on the enemy by well-placed snipers and Lewis guns."

NOTE: Nine members of Lieutenant Jarvis' family were on active service during the war.

Three of his brothers served with the Canadian Forces, two of whom were killed in action. Two other brothers also made the supreme sacrifice.

This unique record of patriotism and service was specially brought to the notice of Their Majesties the King and Queen, and we quote the following letter received by Mrs. Jarvis (mother of Lieutenant Jarvis) from the Keeper of the Privy Purse, dated at Buckingham Palace, 21st November, 1918:

"The King and Queen have heard with much interest of the record of your nine sons' and daughters' services to their country during the war and I am commanded to assure you that Their Majesties much appreciate this example of patriotism in one family.

"Their Majesties are grieved to learn that you have been called upon to endure the heavy burden of the loss of four of your brave sons, but the King and Queen feel that when the history of this war is written, the fact of your four sons having thus gallantly given their lives for the honour of the British Empire must stand out as a noble example of the manner in which the young men of the nation offered themselves in devoted self-sacrifice for their Sovereign and country and will prove a sustaining thought and solace to you in years to come."

We illustrate overleaf the models of the two groups of statuary which the Bank plans to erect as a War Memorial in the proposed new Head Office Building.

HEALING THE SCARS OF WAR

It is the intention of the Bank to incorporate in the design of the proposed new Head Office Building two heroic pieces of sculpture as a memorial and a tribute to the men and women who served in the Great War. At each end of the King Street façade will be great piers affording ample field for inscriptions and sculpture. Against the base of each pier will be placed sculptured groups, of which the above are rough models.

The above illustrations show respectively: (1) The Service of our Women —Healing the Scars of War, and (2) The Service of our Men—Crushing the Power of the Sword.

These illustrations are of the preliminary small wax models, and give a general idea of the groups as they will appear when completed. Mr. Walter S. Allward, R.C.A., is the sculptor.

for Gallant and Distinguished Service in the Field.

Killed in Action, 19th February, 1917.

Note: We quote the following description by the Canadian Record Office of the gallant deed for which Sergeant Lloyd volunteered and which cost him his life:

"78th Battalion Raid, February 19th, 1917."

"One mine shaft was discovered in which an engine was heard and several Germans were working or had taken shelter from our artillery fire. Sergeant Lloyd placed a large portable charge of explosives at the head of the shaft and despite the danger which he knew he must himself incur, he ignited the fuse and then sought to escape. But the terrific upheaval which followed was not only the explosion of the charge but of the German mine itself in which evidently a great quantity of explosives had already been placed. Masses of earth, some of which must have weighed several tons, were thrown into the air. The gallant Sergeant Lloyd was unfortunately buried beneath this avalanche but the German front line at that point was blown to pieces and many of the enemy were killed." 235.

Service: With 80th Squadron, Royal Air Force in France, from January to August, 1918.

Killed in Action, near Amiens, 9th August, 1918.

NOTE: Lieutenant Orr succeeded in bringing down six enemy machines, and, according to a letter from his Squadron Commander, was recommended for promotion and decoration on the morning of his death, for his work during the German Offensive in the Spring of 1918.

"He was one of my most gallant and reliable officers, and loved by everybody. His loss to the Air Force and to the older officers is a heavy one; he was always so bright and so cheery. He was shot from the ground, and must have been killed instantly, as he came down out of control and crashed. He was too good a pilot to lose control unless unconscious. His wrecked machine is still on the other side of the lines. I had hoped to get him a decoration before long in recognition of his splendid work, but now his only reward is a gap which cannot be filled in the hearts of all of us." —His Squadron Commander.

(London Gazette, 5th May, 1917.)

Also Awarded
A BAR TO THE MILITARY CROSS

"For conspicuous gallantry and devotion to duty. This officer, having been sent back to bring up a reserve company, was unable to find his commanding officer on his return, but found that the enemy had occupied part of the line. He promptly formed a defensive flank with the reserve company and any other men he could collect, and by hard fighting checked the enemy's progress. By the afternoon all the officers except himself were either killed or wounded, and it was only by his coolness, in walking up and down the line under intense fire, that he managed to encourage the men to maintain their position.

Service: Operations against German air and water craft over the North Sea, from Eastchurch, Calshot and Felixstowe air stations.

Shot down in action over the North Sea, 15th February, 1918.

NOTE: We are indebted to Mr. Herbert Purdy, of the United States Naval Aviation Service (his brother), for the following details of Lieutenant Purdy's death:

"Claude was up with Ensign Sturtevant of Washington, who, it seems, was an ensign from the United States learning the ropes, Claude being first pilot, in charge and navigating the boat.

"The German who 'got' Claude was Proven Commander Christiansen, who is the German ace of the North Sea, and in charge of all German Air Forces in the North Sea. The Germans mentioned this in their official despatches. They do not mention prisoners taken or not, as a rule.

"In fighting, the large boat comes down to about fifty feet above water. Lieutenant F——. says the machine was not shot down in flames, and says such a report no doubt emanated from a mechanic. Lieutenant F——. also knew Fox, in the other machine, and Fox reports Claude's machine being last seen fighting six German planes and putting up a wonderful fight.

"All the British Naval Air men have been out to 'get' this boy Christiansen for some time and Lieutenant F. has had fights with him, one lasting ten minutes."

We quote the following letter written by a friend of the deceased officer, relative to his death in action:

"We have had some exciting times lately. Ten days ago I went out in one of our large machines, accompanied by C. C. Purdy, in another. We were attacked by nine or ten German machines across 'the other side.' I am sorry to say that Purdy's machine was shot down and all the crew lost. I had been out with Purdy quite a few times. He was a very keen pilot and well liked on the station. He will be greatly missed." 221.

Enlisted, December, 1915, from East Vancouver branch, in 195th Canadian Battalion, with the rank of Lieutenant. Transferred to "B" Battery, 1st Canadian Motor Machine Gun Brigade. Principal actions: Lens, Vimy Ridge, 1917; German Advance, 1918.

Killed in Action, at Villers-Carbonel, near Méricourt (Somme), 24th March, 1918, during the great German offensive.

Note: The 1st Canadian Motor Machine Gun Brigade was one of the few Canadian units engaged in the first days of the great German offensive which commenced on 21st March, 1918. The British newspapers gave unstinted praise to the Canadians engaged in this action for their heroic and successful defence.

The following account of Lieutenant Snyder's gallant death, and of the part taken by his unit in breaking the enemy advance, was given by a driver who was himself wounded in the engagement:

"The Brigade left Vimy on the night of 21st March and with the Borden Armoured Car Battery arrived three kilometres before Méricourt on the morning of the 23rd and were attached to an Imperial Detachment of Infantry only 150 strong—they were strung out on both sides of a road, Hilliard's Battery "B" being on the south side, and further along, the Borden Battery, altogether covering five miles.

"The enemy attacked in vast masses and were simply mown down by our machine-guns. The Huns attacked again and again and in one of these attacks Hilliard's sergeant was wounded rather badly. Hilliard also got a wound in the left hand and succeeded in getting his sergeant placed in a shell-hole. Shortly afterwards he noticed a big Hun jump into the shell-hole and bayonet the sergeant—with this, Hilliard jumped into the hole and tackled the Hun but was overpowered and taken prisoner by him. He, however broke away, and grabbing a Mills bomb, killed the Hun. Then three Huns came along and tried to take Hilliard prisoner, and after a struggle, Hilliard refusing to be taken prisoner, one of them shot him, killing the poor boy instantly."
